

THE I.C.E. MAN COMETH

UPDATE ON CURRENT IMMIGRATION-RELATED WORKPLACE ENFORCEMENT INITIATIVES AND PRACTICAL COMPLIANCE ADVICE¹

February 7, 2017

Current Developments

NCAE offers the following updated guidance with regard to enforcement actions by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), the agency within the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) responsible for immigration-related workplace compliance. This update comes at a moment of extraordinary transformation in immigration enforcement. The change in the preceding 4 years since the most recent update will likely be less than the change in the coming months and years. Throughout these changes, an employer's essential rights and responsibilities have remained constant, however, and this memo speaks to those and suggests "best practices" for employer compliance and successful audits.

In the past decade, under three different administrations, the I-9 Form has undergone multiple revisions, and ICE has shifted its enforcement strategies from raids to audits and now possibly back to raids. Agricultural employers were once targeted by ICE before priorities were directed to other industries. It is important to remember the scope of ICE's reach – even before President Trump requested to triple ICE's workforce. For as frequently as agricultural employers, and particularly H-2A employers are audited by DOL's Wage & Hour Division, there are more than 10 times as many investigators at ICE (almost 20,000) as there are at WHD the (around 1750). ICE is a muscular agency looking to increase its enforcement efforts.

By the time of the next revision to this document, we will know more about the new administration's enforcement priorities and preferences, but here is an overview of recent history and a discussion of general immigration compliance advice.

I-9 Form. On November 14, 2016, the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Service (USCIS) published a revised I-9 Form. As of January 22, 2017, all employers must use this new version for newly-hired employees. Electronic or paper copies of the new I-9 Form are available from the USCIS website, as well as copies of instructions and the USCIS Employer Handbook revised in 2013 (the M-274), at <https://www.uscis.gov/i-9>. The revised I-9 Form was intended to be more user-friendly for those completing the form on a computer, with prompts for missing information, the ability to enter multiple preparers or translators, a dedicated area for adding additional information rather than having to add it to the margins, drop-down menus and calendars for adding dates, on-screen instructions for each field, and instructions separate from the form itself. Previous revisions in 2009 and 2013 added optional fields for employee email addresses and phone numbers and clarified what information was needed for H-2A workers as far as their I-94 number and foreign passport information.

The form also reiterates that it is not to be completed before the employee accepts a job offer and re-states the Anti-Discrimination Notice, but is otherwise substantively the same as earlier editions.

ICE Audits. Under President Obama, ICE changed its enforcement approach, moving away from the large worksite raids that had become common between 2006-2008 and favoring the use of audits and I-9 inspections (the “silent raids” or “desk raids”) followed by civil fines and debarment from federal contracting. Between 2008 and 2012, I-9 audits increased by more than 375% while arrests decreased sharply. At the same time, civil monetary penalties collected from employers ballooned from $675,000 in 2008 to $6.9 million by 2010 and to $16 million by 2013. In the final years of the Obama administration, ICE began to deprioritize audits of agricultural employers, devoting limited enforcement resources to employers in other industries. That practice may now be ending.

ICE Deportation Discretion Policy. DHS issued a new directive on June 15, 2012, announcing a policy of “deferred action” for more than 750,000 undocumented immigrants who arrived in the U.S. as children and met specific criteria (“DACA”). This was undertaken by administrative action, as an exercise of prosecutorial discretion, with DHS deferring deportation proceedings for these individuals and conveying work authorization for a limited period of time. During the campaign, then-candidate Trump promised to revoke this policy but, as of the writing of this memo, has not yet done so. Given the age and education requirements to qualify for DACA benefits, the program has not had a significant impact on the agricultural labor force.

E-Verify. In June 2008 President Bush issued an Executive Order requiring all prime government contractors and some subcontractors to use DHS' E-Verify electronic employment authorization verification system for new hires and existing workers employed on a federal government contract. NCAE commented on the proposed rules implementing the Executive Order and asked that agriculture be exempted under the so-called “commercially available off-the-shelf products” or “COTS” exemption. The final rule excluded agricultural employers. That policy remains in place, and the voluntary E-Verify pilot program has been extended several times.

Mandatory E-Verify Legislation. While the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the right of states to enact E-Verify laws similar to that in Arizona that follow the federal model and limit sanctions to restrictions on business licenses, Congress has introduced a series of bills that would make use of the E-Verify program mandatory for all employers. Many of the bills have included a three-year phase-in period for agricultural employers, but no reforms to the current agricultural worker program. Most recently, Senate Judiciary Chairman, Chuck Grassley, introduced S. 179, the “Accountability Through Electronic Verification Act,” which would make E-Verify mandatory for all employers (agricultural or otherwise) within 1 year of enactment, allow for E-Verify checks before hiring, and significantly increase the penalties for employers for hiring or employing workers not authorized to work in the United States.

E-Verify by Other Means. A leaked draft of a possible Executive Order also calls for the Secretary of Homeland Security to explore options for “incentivizing” employers to choose to use E-Verify including possibly conditioning the receipt of immigration benefits (i.e., H-2A or H-2B visa petitions) on the use of E-Verify. Beyond that, ICE points to pressure on employers to join E-Verify following I-9 audits as the single greatest source of new employers using that system. That is likely to continue or increase in the future.

PRACTICAL CONSIDERATIONS FOR AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYERS PRIOR TO AN AUDIT OR SEARCH AND SEIZURE BY ICE

Facing the prospect of increasing audits and immigration raids, NCAE members are asking for advice as to how employers can prepare for possible visits by ICE and what they should do if they are visited. To respond to these concerns, NCAE asked its Washington, D.C. legal counsel to update a summary of the practical and legal issues that agricultural employers should consider if they receive a visit from ICE or another government agency regarding their compliance with immigration laws. As a result, NCAE has provided this updated document.

This memorandum first examines some of the more general and practical issues that agricultural employers should consider if they are visited by ICE or DOL representatives with regard to compliance with federal immigration laws. After providing some practical tips, the memorandum provides guidance regarding two of the most common circumstances in which an employer will encounter ICE. The first simply involves a routine employment eligibility verification (I-9 Form) audit. The second involves more serious and possible criminal investigations where a search warrant may have been acquired.

Conduct a Self-Audit. An ICE inspection is not unlike an inspection by your doctor or auto mechanic. If you haven't practiced preventative maintenance by the time you have your visit, it is probably too late to avoid the bad news. Unlike the case of a vehicle that runs poorly or a body that does not feel well, where one can control the timing of his/her visit to the mechanic or doctor, one seldom can anticipate when an ICE agent will show up at your office or on your property. Here are some preventative steps that should be considered before you receive an unexpected visit by ICE.

- Review your current employment practices and procedures. Do they comply with the law?
 - Periodically interview your staff to make sure that they are correctly carrying out your I-9 Form and employment eligibility verification policies and procedures.
- Review your record keeping policies and practices. Be sure that you are keeping the proper records for the proper periods of time as required by law. Complete and accurate records are an employer's best defense. By the same token, incomplete or improperly completed forms (i.e., I-9 Form) can ensure liability.
 - Periodically perform a spot check on I-9 Forms and other employment documents to make sure they are being properly and consistently completed by responsible personnel.
- Designate a management representative who is authorized to meet and talk to ICE or DOL personnel when they visit your business.
 - Educate the designated representative about appropriate procedures, including when to call the owner and/or the company's attorney or labor consultant or association.
 - Make sure other employees and supervisors know to refer inquiries from ICE or DOL representatives to the designated company representative.
 - No employee or supervisor should submit to an interview with ICE or DOL or provide requested documents without conferring with the designated company representative.
- The designated company representative should always be polite and assume an attitude of cooperation with ICE. If the ICE inspector does not offer identification, it should be asked for.
- A decision should be made regarding how much to cooperate.
 - ICE personnel are often flexible in arranging routine I-9 audits and the company should likewise try to be flexible.
 - If a criminal or other than routine audit is suspected, you may wish to seek the advice of counsel before cooperating with regard to document and interview requests. A judgment may be made at this time as to whether a search warrant or subpoena is required, if one has not already been presented by ICE.
 - To the extent possible, the breadth of information sought should be narrowed and, if records are sought, the company may consider offering to deliver them, after making copies of what is to be delivered.

- The designated company representative should keep records of all information sought by ICE, the questions that ICE asks, and the answers that the company representative gives. To the extent possible, copies of all documents given to ICE should be made and retained and an inventory list kept.

WHAT SHOULD AN EMPLOYER DO WHEN ICE ASKS TO AUDIT ITS I-9 FORMS?

Typically, an ICE representative will contact an employer by telephone or letter called a Notice of Inspection and requests to visit the employer's worksite to review its employment records to determine whether the employer is complying with federal immigration laws. The Notice of Inspection often includes a subpoena, specifying the documents it wishes to see. Occasionally, an ICE representative will show up at the employer's office without prior notice. What do you do when you get the phone call, letter or onsite visit? Here is a brief review of an employer's obligations related to the employment eligibility verification process using the I-9 Form, as well as an employer's rights once ICE announces it wants to audit that process.

What are an employer's legal obligations that relate to I-9 Forms and employment eligibility verification?

1. Employers must complete an I-9 Form for every new hire and former employee rehired more than three years after the previous date of hire.
2. Employers must reverify employees rehired within three years of the previous date of hire, rather than preparing a new I-9 Form.
3. Employers must retain each I-9 Form for three years after the date of hire or one year after an employee terminates his/her employment, whichever ever is later.
4. Employers must provide their I-9 Forms to ICE for inspection, upon three business day's notice, without demanding a subpoena or search warrant.
5. Employers must use the most current I-9 Form for new hires. As noted above, the current I-9 Form expires on August 31, 2019.

What are your legal rights in an ICE or DOL employment eligibility verification audit?

1. Must you be given notice prior to an audit?
Yes. By law, an employer must be given three days notice by the ICE office before ICE may inspect its I-9 Forms, and ICE generally gives employers the required notice. The inspection can take place at the employer's office or at the ICE office. As a practical matter, a mutually convenient time can usually be arranged between ICE and the employer. If, however, an ICE representative shows up at your office and requests to see your I-9 Forms without any prior notice and it is not convenient for you to produce the I-9 Forms that day, you may demand to be given three days notice to prepare for the audit.²

² 29 C.F.R. §274a.2(b)(2)(ii).

2. Must ICE have a subpoena or search warrant before it can examine your I-9 Forms and related documents?

No. ICE does not need a subpoena or search warrant in order to see your I-9 Forms pursuant to a routine audit. It simply must request to see them and give you at least three days notice.

3. May you limit the documents that you provide to ICE?

Yes. ICE may only request to see I-9 Forms and a list of current and past employees and their Social Security numbers. Without a subpoena, ICE may not request personnel files that contain information beyond that which it needs to determine whether I-9 Forms exist for all current and former employees for whom the employer has an I-9 Form recordkeeping obligation. During the past year, ICE has sent subpoenas along with Notices of Inspection, seeking items such as Social Security “no-match” letters. If an employer copies documents provided by employees to establish employment eligibility and identity for purposes of completing the I-9 Form, ICE is entitled to examine and obtain copies of both the I-9 Form and the attached copies of the documents.

An employer is entitled to retain copies of all documents that it provides to ICE. One of the benefits afforded to employers by the three-day notice requirement is that they have the time to copy requested documents. We strongly recommend that employers make copies of documents that they provide to ICE, especially if ICE takes I-9 Forms and related records off the premises – ICE has lost employers’ original documents in the past. An inventory of all documents taken by ICE should be maintained.

It should be noted that DOL investigators also have the authority to review I-9 Forms. They will normally do so during the course of a wage and hour or other labor-related investigation. With respect to auditing an employer’s I-9 Forms, DOL is governed by the rules described above that relate to ICE; however, you should be aware that DOL is not required to give three days notice for its audit of payroll and other records for which it has separate authority to examine without three days notice. Thus, an employer can demand that DOL afford it three days notice for I-9 inspections, even though it cannot do so regarding other personnel records subject to DOL’s jurisdiction.

4. What should you do if you discover errors on I-9 Forms or missing forms after you receive notice of an I-9 Form audit?

Employers often discover in preparation for an I-9 audit that some of their I-9 Forms are not completely filled out, or in some cases, that I-9 Forms have not been completed for some employees. They then confront the question of what, if any, steps they can take to correct the mistakes or omissions they discover. First, it should be made clear that if an I-9 Form has not been completed, one should be completed right away if the worker is still an employee. The I-9 Form should be signed and dated on the date that it was actually completed--not the date the worker actually began working. The correct date that the worker began work should be noted on the I-9 Form. The signature line for the employer or its representative on the I-9 Form should not be back-dated. While this later completion of the I-9 Form may not present a defense to the failure to complete the form at the time of hire, it puts the employer in a better light by showing that it immediately corrected its mistake once it was discovered. Of course, if the employee for whom an I-9 Form is missing is no longer on the payroll, there is nothing the employer can do to fix the situation.

It is more difficult to answer the question about correcting minor mistakes on the I-9 Form. A common situation is for an employee completing Section 1 of the I-9 Form at the time of hire to write his/her Social Security number in Section 1 where requested and also offer the Social Security card as a List B document in Section 2 to establish employment eligibility. The employer checks the Social Security card box in Section 2 but fails to write in the Social Security card number in section 2. This is a technical mistake. Can an employer later fill in the Social Security card number in Section 2, since the number was listed in Section 1 already by the employee? An argument can be made that such a practice is acceptable since no new facts are added to the I-9 Form. The safest approach would be not to add new information to the I-9 Form that was not on it at the time it was originally completed or add the information but put the date it was added on the form. The 1996 amendments to the immigration law provide that employers will be given 10 business days after notification by ICE to correct technical I-9 Form compliance problems.³ The above example is one that probably could be corrected prior to the ICE audit.

WHAT SHOULD AN EMPLOYER DO WHEN ICE COMES ONTO ITS PROPERTY, DEMANDS TO CHECK WORK AUTHORIZATION DOCUMENTS OF ITS WORKERS AND SEIZES PERSONNEL RECORDS AND OTHER DOCUMENTS FROM THE EMPLOYER'S OFFICE?

As discussed above, ICE audits of employer eligibility verification procedures and related I-9 Forms have become common in worksites and threaten to become more common in agricultural worksites. Somewhat less, but increasingly common, are ICE investigations based on specific information in its possession suggesting that an employer or the agent of an employer may be involved in the knowing hiring of illegal aliens and/or the smuggling and harboring of illegal aliens.⁴ This type of situation poses more serious considerations for an employer. Two typical situations occur. ICE may come into your open fields and start interviewing your workers and asking them for work authorization documents. ICE also may come into your office and demand to take your personnel records, computer data and other documents. Following is a summary of some of the legal and practical issues that should be considered by an employer if these circumstances occur.

What are an agricultural employer's legal rights when ICE enters its property and demands to question its employees regarding whether they are legally authorized to work?

The Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 (IRCA) requires officers and employees of ICE to possess a search warrant to enter open agricultural property without the owner's consent

³ 8 U.S.C. § 1324(a)(b)(6).

ICE to question agricultural workers as to their identity and national origin or their right to be in or remain in the United States. The search warrant provision is not intended to have broad application. It applies only to searches by ICE officers and employees. The areas protected from ICE warrantless entry are the premises of the farm or other outdoor agricultural operations.

ICE will obtain a search warrant in order to question suspected illegal aliens in an agricultural workforce and to seize employment-related documents from an employer's office if it has probable cause to believe that the employer is engaged in employing illegal aliens and/or smuggling and harboring them. The hiring of illegal aliens can be both a civil violation, for which fines are appropriate, or a criminal offense, if it involves a "pattern or practice" of hiring illegal aliens. Smuggling and harboring are criminal offenses. Smuggling often involves proof that the employer knowingly brought or encouraged illegal aliens to enter the U.S. to work in its business. In the agricultural setting, harboring might be established by showing that the employer provided housing on its property to workers that it knew were illegal aliens. See 8 U.S.C. § 1324(a). Unlike ICE's I-9 paperwork violations, these allegations would often be handled and prosecuted by the Department of Justice, under Attorney-General-to-be Jeff Sessions, one of the foremost immigration hardliners in the U.S. government.

A search warrant is not required under the following circumstances:

- If consent is given to enter the property by an owner or his agent;
- If the property is not being used for agricultural purposes;
- If ICE is in "hot pursuit" of an illegal alien who has violated some other provision of the immigration laws; or
- The property is within 25 miles of the United States border.

What are an employer's legal rights when ICE demands to search its office or other buildings for the purpose of obtaining documents, computer data, and other evidence related to the employment of illegal aliens?

ICE, just like other law enforcement agencies, is required to obtain a search warrant before it can come into an agricultural employer's business office or other buildings for the purpose of confiscating personnel files, computers, data, employment policies and procedures, and other documents it believes may provide evidence that an employer is involved in the hiring, smuggling or harboring of illegal aliens. In order to obtain a search warrant, ICE must go before a federal judge or magistrate and show it has probable cause to believe that the employer may be engaged in such illegal activities. Typically, probable cause can be shown through statements of employees or farm labor contractors who have given statements to ICE about the employer's employment practices after they have been apprehended and interrogated by the agency.

If ICE comes upon your property for the purpose of searching and seizing your records and documents and/or to interrogate workers in the field or in a packing or processing facility, it must provide the owner of the property or his/her supervisor or agent, a copy of the search warrant authorizing such activities. This is distinct from the routine audit of I-9 Forms discussed above for which ICE does not need a search warrant or subpoena but must give three business days notice. In addition, ICE can serve an employer with a subpoena and request that it produce documents that may show whether it is employing illegal aliens. See 8 U.S.C. § 1225.

While there is always a practical judgment to be made, if ICE does not present an employer with a search warrant prior to checking the work authorization documents of its employees or searching and seizing records and computer materials from its office, the employer has the right to ask ICE to cease its activities and leave its property until ICE provides it with a warrant. This is the type of situation in which it is prudent to assert the right to call an attorney or to seek expert advice.

What rights does an employer have with respect to property seized from its business pursuant to a search warrant?

An employer has a right to obtain a copy of the search warrant from ICE. In addition, the employer may request and obtain an inventory of all property and documents taken by ICE from its property. If personnel records or other business documents are taken that the employer needs to carry on its business, it can make arrangements through its attorney or otherwise to obtain copies of such documents from ICE. The government will maintain control of the seized property until the investigation is resolved.

Does the fact that ICE comes onto an agricultural employer's property with a search warrant mean that the employer will be charged with a crime?

No. It simply means that ICE has a reasonable basis to believe the employer and/or its employees may be in violation of the law and that it has a duty to follow up on information provided to it by informants or other sources. As a result, it is always prudent for an employer who has been served with a warrant to act, within limits discussed above, in a cooperative manner with ICE and any other law enforcement agencies that may be involved. In some cases, especially where the employer has properly completed and maintained I-9 Forms, employers are not charged with criminal or civil violations after a search of its employees and records. ICE may, however, apprehend and offer summary deportation to those employees found during a search of the agricultural property not to have been in the U.S. legally and with proper work authorization. In such cases, it is the employer's loss of a significant part of its workforce during a peak period that may cause the greatest harm.

Should an employer submit to an interview or allow its management employees to submit to an interview at the worksite during an ICE execution of a search warrant?

This is always a difficult question to answer. From the standpoint of establishing a cooperative relationship with ICE, especially if an employer believes that it has made a good faith effort to comply with the law and has not knowingly hired or authorized the hiring, smuggling or harboring of illegal aliens, there is a natural inclination to answer questions posed by ICE. On the other hand, the fact that ICE has gotten a search warrant indicates it believes that your business may be involved in criminal activity. An employer has a constitutional right not to answer questions during a criminal investigation. Moreover, while an employer cannot obstruct an investigation, it is not required to make its managers or employees speak to the law enforcement agencies once such an investigation and search is under way. Under such circumstances, it may be prudent to consult with a legal advisor and to advise any of your employees whom ICE wishes to interrogate to do the same.

WHAT SHOULD AN EMPLOYER DO AFTER AN ICE AUDIT OR INVESTIGATION PURSUANT TO A WARRANT IF ICE INFORMS THE EMPLOYER THAT CERTAIN EMPLOYEES HAVE PROVIDED THE EMPLOYER INVALID WORK AUTHORIZATION DOCUMENTS?

Once ICE obtains an employer's I-9 Forms and related documents pursuant to a routine audit or a warrant, it will determine whether the document numbers on the I-9 Forms are valid and/or relate to the name associated with them. ICE can check such documents with its own database of ICE-issued documents and with the Social Security Administration. Unless they participate in the E-Verify telephonic and electronic verification program, employers are neither required nor able to independently verify the validity of employment documents given them by job applicants.

After checking the validity of documents, ICE will notify the employer if some of the workers have given invalid documents. This letter is called a Notice of Suspect Documents. Usually, such notification is given in writing; however, there have been instances in the past where ICE has provided such information to an employer by telephone or verbally onsite.

Should an employer always request written direction from ICE indicating which workers are not work authorized?

Yes. An employer should insist it be given written instruction from ICE that certain employees have provided invalid documents. Without written confirmation, an employer faces the risk of a discrimination charge from an employee terminated as a result of incorrect information provided by ICE who is, in fact, authorized to work.⁴ By having a written communication from ICE, an employer is in a more defensible position.

What should an employer do once it receives written notice from ICE that certain employees have provided invalid work authorization documents?

Once an employer receives written notice from ICE that some of its employees have provided invalid work authorization documents, it is put in the position of having knowledge that it may be employing illegal aliens. Given that knowledge, the employer must take reasonable steps to resolve the employment status of the named employees. Failure to do so will subject the employer to charges of knowingly employing an illegal alien.

An employer should inform each employee that ICE has identified them as having provided invalid work authorization documents. The experience of many employers suggests that most employees, confronted with the allegation by ICE that they have provided invalid documents, will voluntarily leave the job and not return. The employee, nonetheless, should be offered a chance to explain any problems or to obtain documentation that further evidences their work eligibility. The employee should be given a limited period of time to produce the documentation. If an employee does follow up with additional work authorization documents, the employer should follow up with ICE to determine whether the new documentation is valid. If ICE indicates that it is not, the employer is in a position to terminate the employee.

We urge caution in this area. If employers fail to act on information provided by ICE, they face employer sanctions charges. If they act too quickly upon it without giving the employee a chance to address the problem, they face discrimination charges. There are a number of cases where ICE has incorrectly informed employers that certain employment authorization documentation is invalid. After the workers have been terminated based on that information, the workers will sue the employer, alleging they were discriminated against on the basis of citizenship status. Giving the employee a chance to rectify any information provided by ICE that turns out to be wrong makes an employer's defense against a discrimination charge stronger.

Should employers compare lists of employees with invalid work authorization document numbers provided by ICE with the names of future applicants for employment?

Yes. As noted above, once ICE provides an employer with lists of individuals whose work authorization cannot be established, the employer is on notice that it may be employing illegal aliens. Once the employer confronts the individual employees with such information and they subsequently are let go or fail to return to work, the employer's duty is not over. It is wise for employers to compare the names and employment document numbers provided by ICE on its list with the names and numbers provided by future applicants for work. If they match, the employer should not re-hire the individuals until their work eligibility status is resolved.

There are examples in agricultural employment where, because of the rapid turnover of seasonal workers, employers who have terminated workers identified by ICE as having given invalid documents have unknowingly rehired them in a subsequent season. Because of the large number of seasonal hires and foremen involved in hiring, the office manager completing the I-9 Form may not remember that the worker reapplying was previously terminated for false documents and accepts his/her documents. If the person completing the I-9 Form does not compare the ICE list of unauthorized workers and their document numbers, with the name and document numbers of each new hire, it is possible to inadvertently hire such person during the next hiring season. If an employer is subject to a follow-up audit by ICE during the next season and ICE finds an individual on the list it previously provided is still employed or reemployed, it is likely it will charge the employer with knowingly hiring an illegal alien.

This situation is illustrated in a criminal case brought against an agricultural employer whose office rehired several workers previously let go as a result of an ICE audit identifying the persons as having invalid work authorization documents. While the workers changed the names on Social Security cards they offered as work eligibility documents when they reapplied to work at the farm the next year, they used the same invalid Social Security numbers. When ICE did another audit and found that the persons had been rehired, albeit with different names but the same Social Security numbers, it indicted the owner of the farm for criminal harboring of illegal aliens. The farmer stated that it checked the names on the ICE list but did not compare the Social Security numbers. ICE apparently believes the owner should have checked both the names and Social Security numbers and has concluded that the employer knowingly hired unauthorized workers and, by providing them with farm labor housing, also harbored them.

Conclusion

This memorandum describes some of the common circumstances employers face during ICE and DOL investigations and the advice provided applies generally to those circumstances. It is nonetheless important that employers facing an investigation contact their own counsel for advice that is tailored to their unique circumstances.
